

Dhamma

The Four Noble Truths

- Dukkha Here is dukkha. Now, dukkha must be fully known. Further, dukkha can be fully known.
- Craving Here is craving, which generates dukkha. Now, craving must be let go of. Further, craving can be let go of.
- Cessation Here is cessation of craving which comes with letting go. Now, cessation must be experienced. Further, cessation can be experienced.
- Path Here is the Path to cessation: rightly aligned view, intention, speech, actions, livelihood, diligence, mindfulness, concentration. Now, this Noble Eightfold Path must be brought to life. Further, the Path can be brought to life.

The Noble Eightfold Path

Glossary
Dhamma (Sanskrit Dharma)	How events lawfully unfold in the world, how phenomena emerge, how action produces consequences, in both the ethical realm and the physical realm.
Noble	Pali ariya . In Brahminic culture, the word had racial and caste overtones; the Buddha ethicized it: not one who is nobly born, but one of noble character.
dukkha	Literally, pain or suffering. More broadly, all that is unsatisfactory in the world: multiplicity, complexity, ambiguity, impermanence. Craving—for one ultimate truth, for a simple answer, for it to be one thing or the other, for pleasure to go on forever and discomfort to end right now—turns dukkha into Dukkha .
samma	Right or correct, in the sense of being rightly aligned with the Dhamma .
“Here is...”	Where else?
